The Masons train Apollo based on the model/rival technique that Irene Pepperberg developed it to train his own African grey parrot, Alex. [3]

In this technique, the student observes the trainer's interaction. One trainer models the desired behavior for the student, who perceives this trainer as a rival for the other trainer's attention. The trainer and rival then switch roles so the student can observe the interactive nature of the process. When a student (human or parrot) correctly answers a question about an object, they receive that object as a reward, rather than food, as is common in other training techniques. Irene Pepperberg stated that the reward system is crucial, as it is the only way students can establish a direct connection between the object and the label they have used. Food rewards are also used sparingly. Occasionally, trainers intentionally make mistakes so students can see the consequences of misidentification. When a trainer makes a mistake, they are reprimanded and have the object taken away. This technique helped Pepperberg succeed with Alex, where other scientists had failed in their attempts to facilitate two-way communication with parrots. [4][5] His research environment often hinders Alex's learning, such as the conflicting need for repetitive assessment (to obtain statistically significant results) and Alex's need for novelty (to keep him motivated).

The story

Apollo came into our lives as a young parrot, surrendered at 8 months old, full of potential and curiosity. Like his parents, Dalton and Tori Mason, we have dedicated ourselves to fostering his growth in a loving and nurturing home. Alongside his two playful caiques, Soleil and Ophelia, Apollo learns and explores in a vibrant social environment. Through our experience with Apollo We hope to inspire others to see parrots as more than just pets: as intelligent and social beings, capable of forging deep relationships and incredible learning.

Approach

We are committed to providing Apollo with a unique education, inspired by preschool homeschooling, to expand his vocabulary, reasoning, and social skills. Based on scientifically supported training methods, we guide Apollo through structured lessons, complemented by free play. By sharing his progress, we hope to unlock the true potential of parrots and contribute to a greater understanding of animal cognition and care.
